Welcome to this fourth edition of the Pinery fire recovery newsletter, and the first for 2016. I trust that you managed to enjoy some time with friends and family over the Christmas and New Year period. While there may have seemed to be signs of lessened activity during that time, there was still plenty of behind the scenes action. The new year will start with new vigour in current projects and plenty of effort through new initiatives. There is still much work to be done and volunteers, together with staff from government agencies and NGOs, will continue to work alongside community members to support the recovery effort and bring about positive change.

Fire affected and fallen trees

The Pinery fire impacted on native mallee and box eucalypt trees growing in scrubs and roadsides in the fire scar. Many old trees that had large hollows and dead wood have burnt from the inside and are now laying on the ground. These will be vital in helping the soil and environment to recover so minimising disturbance around these trees will improve their prospects of survival, as many will reshoot from their charred base.
Why is fallen timber important?
Fallen timber helps the environment recover from bushfire. Logs and branches can slow wind speeds and trap seeds which will later germinate. These seedlings will go on to help stabilise the soil, shade the soil surface, reduce soil water evaporation, and provide cover and protection to native animals and other seedlings that germinate post fire.

What do I do with fallen trees?
Fortunately many fallen trees can be left where they are. Some logs and branches will need to be cleaned up around infrastructure like homes, fences, tracks and sheds. But there are many parts of a property where it is beneficial to leave them lying on the ground. In these areas it is not necessary to ‘tidy up’ fallen trees.

What will happen to the native animals?
Old hollow trees with dead wood are vital habitat for native animals like birds, small bats, possums and lizards. Although no longer attached to the tree, fallen logs and branches provide them with refuge and foraging opportunities in the fire scar. This is vital to sustain their populations while the vegetation recovers.

Will burnt trees recover?
Many trees will reshoot and regrow. It is important to control rabbits, stock and other grazing animals to give regrowth and seedlings a chance to establish.
